QUESTION 4

Despite increasing enrollments of women in medical schools, feelings of isolation among women medical students persist. Women students still have to contend with the social stereotype of a male doctor. In addition, institutions themselves may unintentionally foster feelings of separateness. Comparatively few women are hired for faculty positions, thus offering women students few role models. The pervasive sexual humor of male doctors and students further intensifies women students' alienation. Alienation, in turn, negatively affects individual self-perception. As women enter medical study in increasing numbers, they may feel less at odds with their peers and the teaching establishment. Institutional bias will, no doubt, also change in response to evolving societal values. However, we should not wait passively for gradual social processes to bring changes; schools must provide current students with support services designed to meet women's needs. In a recent study, 48 percent of the women questioned rated a student support group as the most important support service a school can provide.

The author cites factual information in support of which of the following contentions?

- A. Women students have more negative experiences in medical school than male students.
- B. Medical schools are moving rapidly to eliminate the effects of sexual bias.
- C. Many women are psychologically damaged by the feelings of alienation in medical school.
- D. Many women medical students feel a need for officially sponsored support services.
